

SUMMARY

This episode deals with the various needs of humans being which the architecture serves. It categorizes the needs into three: functional needs, psychological needs and aesthetic needs. The evolution of architecture in history, in terms of its form, is explained based on how it caters the various human needs. Examples from other forms of art and design is also illustrated to show how every creation has to cater the various layers of human needs, thus not only the primary functional needs.